This booklet was prepared by the Office of Incentive Systems, U.S. Civil Service Commission, using information from 62 departments and agencies covering 151 honorary awards. The booklet is intended to inform Incentive Awards Administrators and others with major incentive awards program responsibilities of the different types of honorary awards granted by Federal agencies, what they consist of, the criteria on which they are based, the method of presentation used, the level of approval authority, and any restrictions that may exist in granting these awards. The cooperation of departments and agencies in furnishing material for this publication is appreciated.

The Governmental Awards Council

The Governmental Awards Council is the organization which has been established to bring together the various branches of government, both federal and state, to promote the welfare of the public through the use of awards. The purpose of the Council is to encourage the development of merit recognition programs, particularly those which are designed to reward outstanding achievement.

Preface

Since the beginnings of recorded history, man has used awards in various forms as incentives and in recognition of outstanding achievement.

Down through the ages, the laurel, the scroll, the plaque and the medal have been awarded to distinguish the exceptional achievers. It was Napoleon Bonaparte who said: "I challenge anyone to show me a republic, ancient or modern, in which there have not been decorations." Rewards for praiseworthy accomplishment have also taken tangible form of considerable value. In ancient times, awards for the deserving often took the form of land grants, pensions and large sums of money.

Historically, awards for achievement, whether in cash or honorary form or both, have three basic ingredients: (1) there must be makers of achievements -- the doers of exceptional things; (2) there must be bestowers of recognition -- persons or institutions sensitive to the desirability of recognizing the doers in a tangible form, and to the value of the recognition as an incentive to others; and (3) there must be observers of recognition -- the public, organizations, colleagues, etc., to acknowledge achievement and the merit of its recognition.

Honorary Awards in the Federal Government

The Government Employees' Incentive Awards Act authorizes the head of each department and agency to pay cash awards to and to incur necessary expenses for the honorary recognition of civilian officers and employees of the Government who by their suggestions, inventions, superior accomplishments, or other personal efforts, contribute to efficiency, economy, or other improvement of Government operations or who perform special acts or services in the public interest in connection with or related to their official employment.

An honorary award is described in the Federal Personnel Manual as "an incentive award granted by the head of an agency in the form of a certificate, emblem, pin, or other item an employee can wear or display." The honorary award may be granted in addition to a cash award but it is not intended to serve as a substitute for a deserved monetary award. Honorary awards are designed to "select and bestow singular honor as an official recognition of achievement" and as with other incentive awards, they are intended to encourage further accomplishments.

Most departments and agencies have established two or three levels of honorary awards; the highest awards usually being "Distinguished" or "Exceptional" service awards, and consisting of a gold medal and a citation. The second level usually is designated as the "Superior" or "Meritorious" service award, and consists of a silver medal and citation. Top level awards are usually approved and presented by the head of the department or agency or his or her designated representative.

An analysis of the types of honorary recognition granted within Government and specific information concerning such agencies' honor awards programs follows.
